The Small Ordinaries Accumulation Index fell 1.9% during the month with macro concerns continuing to unease many investors. The Fund out-performed the benchmark again, falling by a relatively lower 1.0% in gross terms. There were no major stock or sector performance discrepancies unlike the previous month, where Equinox was the key driver of peer fund performance difference.

Market Outlook

As alluded to above, the well established global macro debates on Chinese growth, US recovery and European sovereign risk concerns continue to dominate investor sentiment. News flows on these factors have been mildly negative in recent weeks but not significantly so. Equity market weakness has been as much seasonal as anything else. May is remarkably consistent as a poor equity market month and it is encouraging that only a small negative return was delivered.

There were a few companies that reported during the month including Thorn Group and Campbell Brothers. These were actually fairly positive, although the domestic economy continues to be quite subdued outside the stand out mining services sector. It has been surprising to see recent weakness in share prices of many resources related companies, given both the outlook and corporate activity in the sector remains very strong.

We still have the fund soundly positioned to take advantage of solid mining activity levels, although we modestly eased this back given the strong run this sector has enjoyed.
